

It isn't rocket science.

It isn't brain surgery.

It isn't even French.

Do you really want to learn 180 endings — just for the verbs! — plus hundreds of exceptions? No, of course not. Nor spelling that's left over from the 1400s. Nor any of the other problems that make any national language so hard to learn. That's why Esperanto doesn't have those things.

Esperanto's grammar is very regular — and very simple. No irregular verbs, no complicated conjugations. And it's completely phonetic. The result? You can become fluent — actually able to speak and read Esperanto — four times faster than you could with some other language. Maybe that's why two million people all over the world speak Esperanto.

Esperanto — the international language that works.
